AVOID CARD SKIMMING

Be wary when you use automated teller machines (ATMs) and other payment processing machines. Thieves may be using high-tech tools to capture your account information. These scams, known as "card skimming" involve attaching devices to money machines that read the information on your debit and credit cards when you swipe them. When combined with a nearby concealed camera to record your personal identification number (PIN), the thieves can get everything they need to make unauthorized purchases.

Thieves may also sell your information to others. ATMs in airports, convenience stores, hotel lobbies, and other well-traveled, public places may be most vulnerable to thieves who may think these machines are not regularly inspected by the machine owners. However, card skimming may take place at any ATM or card processing machine.

As technology makes these devices smaller and more powerful, the risk of card skimming grows.

Before using an ATM, examine nearby objects that might conceal a camera. Check the card slot for a plastic sheath before inserting your card and walk away from an ATM if you notice someone watching you or if you sense something wrong with the machine. Regularly review your account statements, either online or on paper, and check for unauthorized withdrawals and purchases. If you find one, immediately contact your credit union or credit card provider, as this will limit your financial liability for fraudulent charges.
